

Here's Nick Watt. A diplomatic shot across the bows. Time, says the UK, to rethink aspects of the Brexit deal for Northern Ireland after the unilateral threat by Brussels last week to impose border controls on the island of Ireland. The EU hastily retreated, ensuring that Northern Ireland would not be caught up in a row over vaccines. But in a letter to the EU Michael Gove warned that its initial tactics have undermined confidence across Northern Ireland in the Brexit deal. SPEAKER: To Northern Ireland with Ian Paisley. Thank you, Mr Speaker... Unionists are alarmed by the heart of that deal, checks on some goods crossing the Irish Sea. The protocol has betrayed us and has made us feel like foreigners in our own country. Tea and sympathy will not cut the mustard. So, what is the Prime Minister actually going to do when the Prime Minister realises that the EU will do nothing to help Northern Ireland?
